SOLDIERS IN JUAREZ SHOOT AN AMERICAN

Federal Troops Capture Charles B. Dixon, of San Diego; Permit Him to Run and Then Shoot Him Down; He Is Connected With United States Immigration Bureau.

A VICTIM of "ley fags," the nation old Mexican method of getting rid of a prisoner, United States immigration inspector Charles B. Dixon was shot and perhaps fatally wounded Saturday afternoon in Juarez when a squad of Mexican federal soldiers shot him in the back while he was trying to escape.

Inspector Dixon had gone to Juarez Saturday morning upon orders from his chief to investigate a white slave case for the United States government. While he was talking with a negro there, a squad of drunken soldiers from the Juarez barracks arrested him and started toward the foothills south of the town, it is said.

Dixon, fearing that the men were going to attempt his execution because they thought him a United States officer, with his olive drab uniform, started to run down an alley on the outskirts of the town. The soldiers permitted him to run for a short distance, when they opened fire on him, shooting him once in the back.

Dixon's home is in San Diego, Calif., and he has no relatives here. Dr. Taplin, the United States immigration surgeon, was called to Juarez to attend him and an effort will be made through the Mexican consul to get him out of the house where he was taken after the shooting.

Dixon made a statement to the United States officials who went to Juarez to investigate his shooting. He said that he thought that they were going to shoot him and he tried to run when he came to the alley. He said the soldiers were drinking and that he thought that the negro he was investigating in connection with the white slave case had induced the drunken soldiers to arrest him. Dixon said that he offered to go to the commander's quarters with the soldiers, but instead they dragged him toward the outskirts of the town. "I became afraid that they intended to shoot me and I took the first opportunity to escape, when they shot me," Dixon said.

Dixon's wound was through the small of the back and the bullet passed through his stomach. The wound is considered a very serious one.

Dixon was transferred to El Paso from the San Diego immigration station. He is a native Texan, having been born in Huntsville, Tex. His father now lives in Wharton, Tex.

Mrs. Nellie Gardner left Saturday to visit relatives in Mississippi.
